The bicycle race was on Sunday, and on Saturday evening Lena's chain snapped. She wheeled the bike into Grandpa Joe's shed, where tools hung in neat rows on the wall and the air smelt of oil.

"A chain is a puzzle, not a problem," Grandpa Joe said. He handed Lena a spanner and showed her how to loosen the back wheel. Lena worked slowly, checking each link the way he did.

The new chain was too long. Lena sighed. Then Tomas from next door leaned over the fence. "I have a chain tool," he called, and ran to fetch it. Together they shortened the chain by two links and fitted it.

By the time the street lights came on, the bicycle was ready. Lena spun the pedals and the chain ran smooth and quiet. "You fixed it yourself," said Grandpa Joe. Lena grinned. She could hardly wait for Sunday.
