PASSAGE

On Saturday morning, Leo carried his new red kite to the top of Hill Park. The wind was strong, and the kite shot into the sky almost at once. Leo laughed as the string pulled at his fingers. Then a gust tugged harder than he expected. The spool slipped out of his hands, bounced twice on the grass and rolled away down the hill. The kite sailed off over the trees.

Leo ran after it, but the kite was faster. He stopped at the bottom of the hill, out of breath. His eyes stung. The kite had been a birthday present from his grandfather.

"Lost something?" asked a girl sitting on a bench with a sketchbook. She pointed at the tall oak by the pond. High in its branches, the red kite flapped like a flag.

"I can't climb that," Leo said.

"You don't need to," the girl said. "The wind will change this afternoon. It always blows back toward the hill after lunch." She showed him a drawing of the pond with tiny arrows for the wind.

Leo waited. At two o'clock, the branches began to sway the other way. The kite lifted, wriggled free and drifted down onto the grass. Leo grabbed the string before it could escape again. "How did you know?" he asked. The girl smiled. "I come here every weekend to draw. If you watch something long enough, you learn its habits."
